CONCLUSION

Higher borrowing costs and mortgage stress testing are causing the Toronto and area market place to moderate. Market conditions experienced in last quarter of 2018 can be expected to continue into early 2019. Overall continued moderation in average prices and sales will be the norm with some buyers continuing to struggle to find available properties in some Toronto neighbourhoods

DECEMBER 2018 | TORONTO REGION

REAL ESTATE MARKET REPORT

There were no surprises in December. The year came to an end as expected. Higher borrowing costs and the new stress testing measures implemented at the beginning of the year are now a driving force in the Toronto housing landscape. The landscape is now one of moderating sales volumes and Average Sale Prices, as was made evident in December's resale data.

In December sales declined by more than 22 percent compared to last year. Last December 4,876 properties were reported sold by Toronto and area Realtors. This year that number shrank to 3,781, the lowest number of December sales since the 2008 recession. December's sales brought total sales for 2018 to 77,426, a decline of 16 percent from the 92,000 plus sales recorded in 2017, and more than 30 percent fewer than the 113,000 sales reported in 2016. In 2016 mortgage interest rates were half of what they are today, and borrowers did not have to qualify subject to rigid stress testing rules.

In December the Average Sale Price for all properties reported sold in the Greater Toronto Area held up well, coming in at $750,180, 2.1 percent higher than the $734,847 Average Sale Price achieved last December. On an annualized basis, however, Toronto's Average Sale Price declined by slightly more than 4 percent, from $822,000 last year to $787,000 in 2018.

The decline in overall Average Sale Prices was driven primarily by the decline in sales and sale prices for Toronto and area's more expensive properties. In December only 82 properties having a sale price of $2 Million or more were reported. Last December 116 were reported sold. In December 2016, 140 properties were reported sold in this price category. On a year-to-date basis, 2,077 $2 Million plus properties were reported sold. In 2017, 3,435 properties in this price category changed hands, an eye-popping 40 percent decline. It should be noted that the bulk of these sales took place in the first 4 months of the year before the Ontario Fair Housing Plan and increased interest rates took effect.

Notwithstanding these negative figures, the landscape for resale housing remains fractured. It could be argued that these negative numbers are due not only to higher borrowing costs and the stress testing measures but to a lack of supply. In December only 4,308 new listings came to market. Last December 6,289 new listings came to market, a decline of over 30 percent. Heading into 2019 there were only 11,431 properties in the Greater Toronto Area available for Buyers, a decline of more than 11 percent compared to the almost 13,000 available properties last year at this time. Most of the available properties are located in the 905 regions of the Greater Toronto Area. In the City of Toronto, there are only 3,270 properties available to Buyers. In fact, 72 percent of all available inventory is located in the 905 regions.

These inventory levels mean that there will be neighbourhoods, particularly in the City of Toronto, where demand far outstrips supply. This was evident in Toronto's eastern neighbourhoods, (Riverdale, Leslieville, Beaches), where even in December all properties reported sold generated sale prices exceeding their asking price by more than 100 percent. Semi-detached properties in these neighbourhoods sold for more than 105 percent of their asking prices, and in just 11 days or faster.

The inventory shortage can be dramatically illustrated by looking at detached and semi-detached properties available for sale in the City of Toronto. At the end of December, only 377 new detached properties came to market, not many more than the 340 that sold in the month. The situation for semi-detached properties is even more severe. At the beginning of this year, there were only 154 active listings in the entire City of Toronto, only 38 more properties than the 116 semi-detached properties that sold in December. The situation for condominium apartments parallels the shortage of semi-detached properties.

These property shortages would normally result in substantial price appreciation. Normal however is no longer 2.5 percent five-year fixed mortgage interest rates. Bank posted rates are currently 5.59 percent, and even if that isn't the rate borrowers will have to pay, the Buyers will, because of stress testing, be required to qualify at that rate. The disappearance of cheap and easy money is now driving the Toronto and area marketplace.

Looking forward, certainly, in the short term, there is nothing on the horizon that will see any dramatic changes to the current Toronto real estate market. Sales volumes will be lower than historic norms, and average prices will continue to moderate. Currently, unemployment numbers are at a 40-year low. Subject to stability in the mortgage markets, wages should start to rise beyond inflationary levels which with time will ease our prevailing affordability problems, which in turn should see moderate increases in sales volumes and to some extent in Average Sale Prices. The process will be slow with both Buyers and Sellers at times adjusting painfully to the new resale landscape.
